INDEX, ... 687

PREFACE.

PREFACE.

I.

The Exchequer accounts now published are those of the last eight audits of the reign of James III., namely from 1480 to 1487 inclusive. The accounts of the custumars and bailies of the burghs are complete, as are those of the Ballivi ad Extra, except for the year 1483. There are no extant accounts of the Sheriffs.

The Appendix subjoined to this volume calls for a few words of remark. The first and larger part of it is taken from the earliest Crown Rental books now extant, namely, those belonging to the period of this volume. The matter contained in them, as supplementary to, and explanatory of, the accounts of the Ballivi ad Extra, is indispensable to any one consulting these accounts for purposes of investigation. The Rentals will be found to contain a fund of information regarding the nature and conditions of the tenancy of land; nor is their value small to the genealogist and student of local surnames. The Crown lands are let by Commissioners nominated under the Privy Seal, of whom the Comptroller is always one, and whose commission is usually given at length. A grassum, sometimes but not always corresponding to one year's rent, is paid at the outset of each lease, besides in many cases a separate sum known as "introitus." The Crown tenants, whose names are all given, are seen to vary in status from members of the chief families in the country to ordinary agricultural labourers. The Commissioners are generally empowered to grant leases for either three or five years; a three years' lease is the rule, and is often granted in anticipation when the existing lease has yet two years to run. Five years' leases prevailed in Galloway. A few exceptional cases occur of longer leases, as of Lednach in Methven to Alexander Naper and his wife, and of Thomastoun in Fife to Patrick Erskine and Alison Spens his wife, each for nineteen years;[1] of several steads in Ettrick Forest to Cranstoun of that Ilk for thirteen years;[2] and of Culcagry and Methfeld in Galloway to Robert Carlile for seven years.[3] To assign or sublet was generally prohibited: but there are special permissions to do so given to favoured tenants, like Guthry of that Ilk, the Bishop of Dunkeld, Lord Avandale and his nephew, Drummond of Cargill, and Patrick Erskine.[4] We have instances of leases forfeited by the marriage of a female tenant without leave, and sometimes renewed to the husband on his paying the proper grassum.[5] In comparison with the Exchequer Rolls, these records are carelessly written, and often so full of grammatical solecisms that to extend the contracted words becomes a matter of difficulty. Intermingled with the regular rentals are separate notes of changes of tenancy at intermediate dates. Interlineations and deletions ex post facto often occur, which an attempt has been made to indicate by lines and brackets. In some of the Crown lands leases and grassums had not been introduced, and the occupiers were, as in Bute, "kindly tenants;" of these, of course, no rentals are found.

The destruction of the great mass of the Sheriffs' accounts has been repeatedly alluded to in these Prefaces. One important item in those lost accounts,—the feudal payments made by Crown vassals on their succession,—was also entered in a separate and very valuable series of books, known as the "Libri Responsionum," referred to from time to time in the extant Sheriffs' accounts, which, in the sixteenth century, may be consulted to supply this missing information. The extant Responde Books begin in 1513; but the editor has, since the publication of the last volume of this series, become aware of the existence of a manuscript Index or Minute-book of the "Responsiones" in the archives of the General Register House, going as far back as to the accession of James II., which is virtually also an index to the corresponding portion of the Sheriffs' rolls. Comparing the Index for 1455 and 1456 with the still extant Sheriffs' accounts of these years,[1] it will be found to contain an exact note of each entry so far as the names of the lands and of the heir are concerned, the order and arrangement being identical with those of the rolls of the Sheriffs. The portion of this Index belonging to the reigns of James II. and James III. forms the second part of the present Appendix.

II.

Taking up the thread of the general history at the time when this volume begins, the interruption of the good understanding with England began soon after the flight of the Duke of Albany and death of the Earl of Mar. Three yearly instalments of the dower of the Princess Cecilia had been paid in February 1474–5, February 1475–6, and February 1476–7: but since then no further payments had been made. So far as the English King was concerned, the moving cause of that matrimonial project had been the wish to detach Scotland from the French alliance: but this motive was no longer operative after Edward had himself concluded peace with France.

Albany, on escaping from Scotland, first made his way to the French Court, where he met with a hospitable and even distinguished reception from Louis XI., who was again on bad terms with Edward IV.: and he became husband of Anne de la Tour, daughter of Bertrand Count of Boulogne and Auvergne. Louis sent an embassy to Scotland, with the double purpose of interceding for Albany and inducing James to break the truce with England. On 12th May 1480, the relations of the countries had become such that Edward appointed his brother, the Duke of Gloucester, Lieutenant-General of the North, to lead an army against Scotland.[1] In February and March 1480–1 preparations were made for the march of an English army to the frontier.[2] The proceedings of the Scottish Parliament which met in April 1481 included vigorous measures for the defence of the country, and the imposition of a tax for the victualling and defence of Berwick.[3] Continual skirmishes occurred between the two countries, including a Scottish inroad into England, in which the Earl of Angus burned Bamborough.[4] The death of Thomas Spens, Bishop of Aberdeen (14th April 1480), is attributed by Lesly to his sorrow at the cessation of the amicable intercourse between the two countries which he had so much at heart.

The Fife account audited in July 1480 contains two payments towards the expenses of the Queen's confinement "in Fratribus,"[5] probably the birth of her youngest son John, on whom the earldoms of Mar and Garioch were conferred in his childhood, and who died 11th March 1502–3.

The records of the Parliament which met at Edinburgh in March 1481–2 explain in some measure the course of public events in 1481. James sent an envoy to the English King asking him to abstain from aiding the Duke of Burgundy, else he would consider it his duty to give his support to France. A herald and a pursuivant were sent with an offer to redress any infringement of the truce by his subjects, provided Edward would do the like; but, after a long detention, these officers of Arms were dismissed without an interview or an answer. To avenge this insult, James assembled an army with the purpose of invading England; but, in deference to a monition of the Pope forbidding hostilities, he is said to have disbanded his army, understanding that Edward would do the same. As corroborative of the alleged advance into Scotland of a nuncio with the papal monition, we find a payment of £20 "cuidam Gelicane, nuncio apostolico," by George Robisone, custumar of Edinburgh, allowed in his account of 1483, in respect of a Precept under the sign manual.[1]

Edward meanwhile, heedless of the papal remonstrance, proceeded to invade Scotland by sea and land, besieging Berwick, ravaging the borders, and burning Blackness. The English fleet, however, was gallantly repulsed by the famous sea-captain, Andrew Wood of Leith, who, in recompense for his services and losses, got a feu-charter of Largo, which he had formerly held in lease.[1]

The brief Chronicle at the end of the Royal manuscript of Wyntoun in the British Museum, which, as being near the date, is perhaps the most trustworthy history of the period, speaks of the presence of famine and pestilence in Scotland at this time, partly arising from the wars on the borders, and partly from the "blak cunye in the realm."[2] Of the troubles on the borders we have a few indications in the Exchequer accounts, which tell us that on 28th February 1482–3 Patrick Dikeson, bailie of Peebles, had a grant under the Great Seal of £8, 3s. 4d. yearly for nineteen years to come, for his services in capturing certain rebels to the King, James, Laurence, Simon, and John Elwald, Robert Turnbull, and Robert Dalglesch,[3] an entry which appears year after year in the burgh accounts, from 1484 onwards. The Elwalds or Elliots were known about or after that time as fast adherents of the Earl of Angus.[4] The unquiet condition of the East March at that date is also alluded to in connection with the half-waste state of the granges of Dunbar in an account of 1486.[5]

In June 1481 Edward had empowered Patrick

Haliburton, chaplain,[1] and others, to conclude an alliance with the Lord of the Isles and Donald Gorme.[2] In the banished Earl of Douglas the English King found a willing instrument to harass the borders; and he was at the same time engaged in a yet more formidable intrigue with the Duke of Albany, the object of which was to substitute that Prince for his brother on the throne of Scotland.

The naïve and unconventional phraseology used towards the English King by the already mentioned Parliament of March 1481–2, in whose Acts he is "the revare Edward, calland him King of Ingland," gives some notion of the strength of the national indignation. Preparations were again ordered on an extensive scale for the defence of the country. In case of an invasion by Edward in person, the Scottish King is to appear in the field at the head of his forces; and the Estates express their firm resolve to live or die with him. The same Parliament offered a high reward for the capture of the Earl of Douglas, dead or alive; and among its proceedings were the trial of Lord Lyle, and his acquittal, for corresponding with Douglas.[3]

treaty with Edward, by which, under the designation of "Alexander, King of Scotland by the gift of the King of England," he agreed to perform homage to the English King, to break the league with France, and to make over to Edward Berwick, Lochmaben, Liddesdale, Eskdale, and Annandale; while Edward was to assist him in reducing Scotland, and to give him in marriage the same Lady Cecilia, who had been already betrothed to Prince James, provided Albany could make himself "clear of other women."[1] In pursuance of this agreement, an English army, headed by Gloucester and accompanied by Albany, marched towards the Scottish border. Angus and a few others were privy to Albany's treason. With the rest, the general unpopularity of the King (arising from his devotion to the professors of the fine arts, and also from his tampering with the coinage) produced an inclination to view without disfavour Angus' proposal, that, instead of attacking the common enemy, they should use the present opportunity to rid themselves of the King's low-born advisers and favourites. The result was that Cochrane, Roger, and several more of the King's associates were incontinently seized and hanged on Lauder Bridge; the King himself was conveyed under restraint to Edinburgh, where he was shut up in the Castle; and the army was disbanded, the country being left entirely open to the attack of the enemy. Accordingly Berwick, which the Scots had possessed for the last twenty-one years, again fell into the hands of the English, never to be recovered by Scotland,[1] and the English army marched unimpeded to Edinburgh.

Among the royal favourites put to death at Lauder the most prominent in the pages of all the historians is Thomas Cochrane, a mason or architect, under whose advice the King had resorted to those measures regarding the coinage which had brought on him such obloquy. Cochrane affected the state of a great nobleman; and of the writers of the next generation, some assert that he was made Earl of Mar, while others seem rather to suggest that he only received the whole or part of the revenues of that earldom, and in consequence either styled himself or was derisively styled by others Earl of Mar. It is remarkable how little contemporary information exists regarding Cochrane. His name does not appear in the early chronicle already alluded to, nor is it to be found in the Register of the Great or of the Privy Seal. The only record in which he figures is the "Acta Dominorum Concilii," where his name twice occurs.[2]

[1] The accounts of the custumars and bailies of Berwick are rendered for the last time in July 1481 (pages 145, 157). The account of the earldom of March, rendered in 1486, informs us that between the date of the latest accounts of Berwick and its capture, the Earl of Crawford and Lord Gray were keepers of the town, and Sir Patrick Hepburn of Dunsyare of the Castle.—Page 433.

[2] On 22nd January 1479–80, Thomas Cochrane gets decree against Hugh Rose of Kilravok, William thane of Calder, and Thomas and Alexander Cumyn, for sums amounting together to £60, which they had been bound to pay

In the extant Exchequer Rolls his name is also absent (it must be remembered that they exclude the accounts of the Sheriffs and of the Ballivi ad Extra for 1483): nor can their testimony be adduced as decisive of the question whether he is or is not to be numbered among the interpolated Earls of Mar. From 1451 onwards, the rents of Mar are accounted for as in the hands of the Crown, under circumstances explained in a previous Preface.[1] In 1459 or 1460, John, third son of James II., was made Earl of Mar, and had his sasine in the earldom;[2] but so long as that Prince was in pupillarity, the Mar accounts continue, being, after the death of James II., among the Queen's accounts, as Mar had been included among the lands settled on Mary of Gueldres in 1451. In consequence of Prince John having attained the age of fourteen, the Mar accounts cease in 1471. On his death in 1479, one would naturally expect to find Crown accounts of Mar extending down to its bestowal on Albany in 1483; but it may be remarked that there are none till 1484, the account of that year going no further back than Martinmas 1483, and being divided into two parts, to the late Sir John Colquhoun (then usher of the King's chamber) on resignations made by them, and which the King had now assigned to Cochrane. Then, on 2nd May 1483, Archibald of Preston, having been presented by the King to William Lord Sinclair the overlord, as tenant of the lands of Cowsland, forfeited by the deceased Thomas of Cochrane, it is decerned by the Lords that Sinclair is bound to receive the new tenant, notwithstanding an assertion by him that he is infeft in these lands with fee and forfeiture.—Acta Dominorum Concilii, pp. 49, 82.

one accountant (the Earl of Huntly) being lessee of Strathdon and Garioch, while the other (Gordon of Migmar) is lessee of Strathdee and Cromar. This interval seems at least to show that the revenues of the earldom were out of the Crown's hands during the period when Cochrane is said to have been Earl.

William Roger, a musician of note, whose pupils were in Ferrerius' time famous in Scotland, is also enumerated among the victims of Lauder Bridge. Of James' devotion to music and musicians there are many traces in the records. Roger, however, through whose means he reorganised the choir of the Chapel Royal of Stirling, is, like Cochrane, unmentioned in the Exchequer accounts. His name once occurs in the Register of the Great Seal, as having (under the designation of "familiari armigero regis") the lands of Traquair bestowed on him, and resigning them after the general revocation.[1]

If the absence of all mention of Cochrane and Roger is noteworthy, equally so is the frequent

[1] Reg. Mag. Sig., viii. 141, 3 Feb. 1478–9. Of other musicians, there is frequent mention in the Exchequer Rolls of this and the next reign of various lutars and harpers; Thomas Yester (vol. viii. page 30); Martin M'Bertny, who had for his fee the fermes of Clutach and Knokane, the lands which he occupied in Galloway (vol. viii. pages 89, 163, 215, 287, 342, 420, 489, 605; vol. ix. pages 20, 246, 299, 377, 461, 582); Thomas Wardlaw, who had similarly the fermes of Brigland in Strathern (vol. viii. pages 55, 57, 272, 361, 425, 517, 614; vol. ix. pages 42, 119, 167, 572); and John Wardlaw, lutar, who had the rents of lands occupied by him in Ballencreif (vol. viii. pages 299, 353, 427, 529, 590; vol. ix. pages 23, 127, 171, 207, 302, 359, 476, 579, 580). The Treasurers' Accounts of this reign (vol. i. p. 43, preface p. cxcviii.) contain a payment to John Brown, lutar, sent abroad (apparently to Bruges) to perfect himself in his craft.

mention of a favourite of inferior grade, James Hommyl, the King's tailor, regarding whom there is a consensus of historians that he was one of the victims of Lauder Bridge, but who nevertheless is shown by these records to have survived that insurrection, and continued in life and office during the remainder of the reign. As early as 1473 Hommyl has his fee from the fermes of Skeach in Stirlingshire, of which the grassum is remitted to him.[1] He continues to have his £20 from the Crown lands in Stirlingshire "pro suo servicio impenso et impendendo,"[2] said to be paid in consequence of his being one of the royal household.[3] A further £20 is allowed him in 1477 for repair of his house,[4] and an additional payment of fourteen bolls of malt to him occurs in the accounts of 1478.[5] On 20th January 1477–8, the King, after his revocation, granted a precept under the Privy Seal for his pension from the Stirlingshire lands, "for the singular favour which we have to our familiar servitour and workman for our persoun James Hommyl," which is engrossed in the Rolls:[6] and the payment is made to him till the close of the reign.[7] The Rentals show him to be at the same time tenant of five bovates of Skeach.[8] Advancing beyond the period of this volume, in the first Exchequer audit of James IV. on 10th July 1488, the Chamberlain of Stirlingshire is allowed the first term's payment of Hommyl's pension, but not the second, because he had left Scotland without the King's leave; and Hommyl's goods are therefore confiscated, and an inquiry is ordered regarding his grains and chattels on Skeach.[1] Soon afterwards, in the records of the first Parliament of James IV., Hommyl confesses himself an accomplice in certain treasonable acts, for which he submits to the King's mercy.[2]

The name of John Ramsay, the favourite of the King who escaped execution by reason of his youth, is of frequent occurrence in this volume. He is an auditor of Exchequer in 1484 and subsequent years,[3] is alluded to as having an office in the household,[4] and is a Commissioner for letting the Crown lands.[5] About the year 1484, as the Rolls inform us, he married Isabel Cant, widow of Thomas of Dumbarton.[6] They have a grant on their marriage of the mill of Stramiglow in Fife,[7] and a nineteen years' lease of the two Kinkells in Strathern.[8] Caldanelee was also let to him in steelbow.[9] He has the designation of Lord Bothwell for the first time at the audit of 1485,[10]

the lordship of Bothwell having been granted or confirmed to him on 16th February 1483.[1]

III.

While the leading nobility had co-operated with Angus in putting James' favourites to death and taking possession of the King's person, many of them were unprepared for the further step of supplanting the King by his brother; and, the full extent of Albany's trafficking with England not being generally known, there was effected, through the mediation of the Archbishop of St Andrews, Lord Avandale, and other friends of James, an apparent reconciliation between the two brothers, by which Albany was restored to his lands and offices on condition of his returning to his allegiance,[2] and was even made to pose as the King's deliverer from the thraldom in which his uncles, the Earls of Buchan and Athole, had endeavoured to keep him. This was effected through an arrangement between the King's uncles and his brother, by which the latter made a feint of laying siege to Edinburgh Castle and capturing it. The allusions to the course of events to be found in charters of this date must therefore be received with caution, as being the ex parte statement of Albany, who was virtually at the head of the State. On 16th

November 1482, two charters were granted to the citizens of Edinburgh in reward for their good services in aiding Albany in the rescue of the royal person from his captivity in Edinburgh Castle, the one granting them the customs of Leith, the other investing the chief magistrate with a right of sheriffdom within burgh.[1] On 18th January 1482–3, Walter Bartrahame, burgess, and shortly before that date provost of Edinburgh, got a pension of £40 for his aid "in deliberacione nostre persone regie de captivitate et warda in castro nostro de Edinburgh.[2] On 17th January 1482–3, John Dundas of that Ilk had the lands of Bothkennar bestowed on him for his aid in liberating the King from captivity;[3] and about the same date a charter to Alexander Duke of Albany, containing a fulsome laudation of his services in besieging Edinburgh Castle and delivering the King from durance at the imminent peril of his life, bestowed on him the Earldoms of Mar and Garioch.[4]

On 14th August the provost and community of Edinburgh, with the view of establishing a good understanding with England, made offer to refund to Edward IV. the sums which had been paid as dowry of the Princess Cecilia, in case the English King should prefer not to complete the engagement;[5] and on 12th October, Edward sent Garter

King of Arms to intimate that he preferred the repayment to the fulfilment of the marriage,[1] which was notified to the community of Edinburgh on 25th October. About the same time negotiations were renewed for the marriage of Princess Margaret of Scotland with Anthony Earl Rivers, a project whose speedy abandonment is sufficiently accounted for by reasons personal to the lady.

Albany was made Lieutenant-General of the realm at a Parliament held in December 1482:[2] and a few weeks later the English records prove him to be steadily pursuing his old traitorous courses. Edward, having on 8th February 1482–3 empowered the Earl of Northumberland and other Commissioners to treat with the ambassadors of Alexander Duke of Albany, entered on the 11th of that month into a formal treaty with that Prince to aid him in obtaining the throne of Scotland, the Duke on his part engaging to put an end to the French league, to give up all claim to Berwick, and to restore the Earl of Douglas, while the English King is to give him one of his daughters in marriage.[3]

It is certain that these intrigues became speedily known to James and his friends, with the result, however, neither of civil war nor of Albany's immediate downfall, but of an indenture between the King and his brother, one duplicate of which has been preserved in the General Register House, a compact which may be fairly called without a parallel, both in respect of the Duke's unblushing avowal of treasons of the deepest dye, and of the barely nominal punishment méted out for these crimes. The principal stipulations are—1. That the King is to receive his brother into favour, and grant a full remission under the Great Seal and with the authority of Parliament of all treasons and other misdeeds, both to Albany himself, and also to all those accomplices whose names he should furnish. 2. That a rumour which has gone abroad that an attempt was made to poison Albany in the King's presence and palace, is to be declared by Albany in Parliament to have been a groundless slander. 3. That, whereas Albany has entered into certain treasonable bands with King Edward, and with certain persons in England and Scotland, he is to give his letters patent to the King of England renouncing these bands, and to discharge Andrew, Bishop Elect of Moray, the Earls of Athole, Angus, and Buchan, Lords Crichton and Gray, John Douglas of Morton, Alexander Hume, nephew of Lord Hume, and Sir James Liddale of Halkerstoun, of the obligations into which they had thus entered with him; and the Earls of Angus and Buchan, Lords Crichton and Gray, and Sir James Liddale, are in like manner to renounce their unlawful bands to the King of England. 4. That Alexander Hume and some of his friends and kinsmen, whom Albany had arrested on information that they were charged by the King to put him to death, should be liberated on the King's disavowal of any such purpose. 5. Albany is not to approach within six miles of the King without special leave, and shall not be charged to do so without his own consent. 6. He is relieved of his office of Lieutenant-General, but is faithfully to discharge his duty as March Warden. 7. He is to endeavour to procure peace with England, and the marriage of the heir-apparent with the Princess Cecilia. 8. He is to put from him Andrew Elect of Moray, and the other persons above named, and not to hold in daily household either them or the persons of less consideration who have been summoned to Parliament for crimes; and these persons are not to come within six miles of the King's residence, except to their dwelling place; Douglas (son of the Earl of Morton) having, however, licence to come to his father's place.[1] 9. The Earl of Buchan is to resign the offices of Great Chamberlain, Warden of the middle Marches, keeper of Newark and Methven, and bailie of Methven; the Earl of Angus is to resign the offices of Justiciary south of Forth, Steward of Kirkcudbright, keeper of Threave Castle, and Sheriff of Lanark, and the ward and marriage of the heir of Dalhousie; and Sir John Douglas is to resign the sheriffship of Edinburgh. 10. The Earl of Buchan, Lord Crichton, and Sir James Liddale are banished for three years.

[1] Dalkeith.

11. Albany is to take into favour the Archbishop of St Andrews, and not to abet the Bishop Elect of Moray in taking advantage of a pretended resignation of his see which the primate had been constrained to make through force and fear. 12. Albany is to take into favour the Lords of the King's Council.

The existing copy of this indenture is signed by Albany at Dunbar, 19th March 1482–3.[1] The Parliament referred to, in which its provisions were to be sanctioned, met in March 1482–3. Besides purely formal matters, its records only give a succession of adjournments to the 2nd, 10th, and 21st March, 7th April, 16th and 27th June, "pro nonnullis arduis materiis dictum supremum dominum regem et rem publicam regni concernentibus."[2]

Meantime Albany, instead of implementing any of the stipulations of this extraordinary compact, strengthened himself in Dunbar Castle, with the active co-operation of Lord Crichton and those other friends whose counsel he had forsworn, despatched Sir James Liddale into England to renew his league with Edward, received and entertained an English pursuivant (Bluemantle), and repaired to England, while an English force was by his contrivance admitted by James Gifford of Sheriffhall into the Castle. Nor did the death of Edward IV. (April 9, 1483) and accession of Richard III. cut short these intrigues. On 27th June 1483, the long-suffering of the King and his friends being at last exhausted, Parliament pronounced sentence of attainder against Albany and Liddale. At the next meeting of Parliament in February 1483-4 the same doom of forfeiture was pronounced against Crichton, Liddale's eldest son, David Purvis, and some thirty-four persons of less note, the charges against Crichton including traitorous correspondence with Albany in England after his forfeiture, and the fortification of Crichton Castle against the King. Diligent search was at the same time ordered to be made for other abettors of Albany, that they might be brought to justice. Provisions were made for arming the realm and appeasing the feuds of the nobles, and for proceeding on the 1st of May with the siege of Dunbar Castle.[1]

It appears from the Exchequer accounts that the preparations at least for the siege had begun before the date here mentioned.[2] The Edinburgh customs' account of August 1484 contains a payment of £53 for inter alia the purchase of necessaries "ad naviculam domini regis dictam rowbarge" at the time of the siege of Dunbar.[3] But the principal entries connected with this siege are to be found in the account rendered by Simon Salman of the earldom of March in 1486. This account purports to go back to the departure of Albany from Scotland, after Whitsunday 1483;[1] but it contains matter earlier than that date, and belonging to the period before the rising of Lauder Bridge, when the process of forfeiture was hanging over Albany, then in England, and the earldom of March was virtually to the King's hands. The grain rents of 1480 and 1481 are accounted for, and the expenses connected with them allowed, but not those of 1482, which are said to have been received by the Duke of Albany.[2] Dunbar Castle is stated to have been in the custody of John Murray of Tulchadam (one of the King's friends) in 1481, and both before and after it.[3] £42, 11s. are paid to William Anderson, carpenter, for the manufacture of a "sow"—afterwards brought (it is said) to Edinburgh—probably on occasion of the truce of September 1484, to be alluded to by-and-by; and there are charges for gunpowder, for a mould for making bombards, and for "artillery."[4]

The siege proceeded slowly and unsatisfactorily; and other events deserving notice were taking place during its progress. Richard III., who had at first received and entertained the Duke of Albany, soon found that his own difficulties at home made it desirable for him to be on a good footing with his northern neighbours. Though continuing to pension the Earl of Douglas,[1] he gave safe conducts on 29th November 1483 and 8th March 1483–4 to the ambassadors of the King of Scots.[2]

Among the events of 1484 is the final attempt of Albany and Douglas, no longer aided by England, to recover their footing in Scotland. On St Magdalene's day (July 22) they suddenly appeared with a body of 500 horse in the border town of Lochmaben, where a fair was being held, in hopes that they would be joined by their old friends and followers. But they found no sympathy in the quarter where they expected it. The burghers put themselves in an attitude of resistance, and were joined by the neighbouring gentry with what bands they could muster. The English were thoroughly routed, Albany escaping, but Douglas being overtaken and captured by Alexander Kirkpatrick, who was rewarded by a grant of Kirkmichael in Dumfriesshire and various lands in the Merse.[3] The services of Robert Crichton of Sanquhar and Edward Crichton also obtained recognition by charters to be found in the Great Seal Register.[4] James, with the same leniency that had characterised his treatment of his brother Albany, condemned Douglas to the seclusion of Lindores Abbey, where a doubtful tradition asserts that he assumed the cowl. There is record evidence that he had contracted a second marriage, after his expatriation, with an English widow, who, of date 2nd February 1486–7, is called "Anna, que fuit uxor Jacobi Douglas comitis de Douglas."[1] If this expression be rightly interpreted as asserting that Anna was Douglas' widow, the picturesque story of James having asked Douglas' advice and assistance before Sauchieburn is disposed of.

Nor did Albany long survive this raid. He escaped to Paris, died there in 1485 from the splinter of a lance in a tournament, and was buried in the church of the Célestins.[2]

A few remarks may be added about Albany's marriages and issue. His first wife was Katherine, daughter of William Sinclair, Earl of Orkney and

[1] The author of this Preface here acknowledges his obligations to Mr Joseph Bain, editor of the Calendar of Scottish Documents in the Record Office, for valuable information regarding Douglas' second marriage. The proofs of it will probably appear in the fourth volume of Mr Bain's Calendar. Suffice it here to say, that on 2nd February 1486–7, a writ is directed to the King's escheator in Devon, directing inquest on the lands of "Anna, que fuit uxor Jacobi Douglas comitis de Douglas, que de nobis tenuit in capite, etc.:" and in the inquisition itself, dated Exeter, 16th April 1487, it is affirmed that Ralph, late Earl of Westmorland, conveyed certain manors to one John Neville and the said Anna his wife, and the heirs of John's body, with reversion to the Earl himself failing such heirs; that John and the Earl having successively died without issue, these reversions have descended to Ralph, now Earl of Westmorland, as kinsman and heir of the late Earl, being son of one John Neville, knight, brother of the deceased the Earl and said Anna. Anna is stated to have died 26th December 1486, and the present Earl to be her son and heir, and upwards of thirty years of age. Other inquisitions state the relationship similarly; and it would thus appear that the lady in question was widow in succession of two Nevilles before she married Douglas. Mr Bain considers her to have been a daughter of John Holland, Duke of Exeter.

Caithness; but that marriage was dissolved by the Official of Lothian, on 2nd March 1477–8, on the ground of relationship within the fourth degree of consanguinity,[1] a sentence afterwards recorded by order of Parliament in 1516. He married secondly, 10th February 1479–80, Anne de La Tour, daughter of Bertrand Count of Boulogne and Auvergne, who in her widowhood remarried Louis Count de la Chambre.

His first marriage could only have subsisted for a few years, as the date of his birth was about 1454; but there seem to have been three sons born of it, and also a daughter. The accounts of the Earldom of March for 1490, 1491, and 1492, contain yearly payments of £20 to John Craw for the maintenance of three boys of the Duke of Albany, who were under his guardianship.[2] The youngest of the three must then have been about fifteen years of age. The Treasurers' Accounts contain in 1497 a gift by the King of 28s. to the Duke of Albany's "tua sonnys" in St Andrews,[1] and a further gift of 28s. to Alexander Stewart, the Duke of Albany's son,[2] and in 1498 "ane horse, value £6, 13s. 4d., to Sande Stewart, the Duke's sone."[3] In 1496, £3, 6s. are paid for clothing for "the Duke of Albaneis dochter."[4] Katherine, daughter of the Duke of Albany, is said by Duncan Stewart to have married Patrick Hamilton of Kincavil, natural brother of the 1st Earl of Arran, and been mother of Patrick Hamilton, Abbot of Ferne in Ross, the Reformation martyr. Buchanan also calls the mother of Patrick Hamilton a sister of John Duke of Albany, but without giving her Christian name.[5] The widow of Patrick Hamilton of Kincavil is called Margaret Stewart in the Great Seal Register,[6] and if Mr Dickson's supposition be right that a "Margaret Stewart," mentioned in the Treasurers' Accounts, is daughter of the Duke of Albany,[7] she was probably the lady who afterwards married Hamilton.

Chalmers' hypothesis ("Caledonia," ii. 258), that this divorce never took place, and that the sentence of the Official of St Andrews was a forgery of 1516, had no other basis than a supposed discovery that Otterburn, who granted the divorce, had ceased to be Official of St Andrews within Lothian before 1473. The Great Seal Register, however, contains contemporary evidence that Otterburn was Official of Lothian as late as May and June 1478.—Reg. Mag. Sig., viii. 99, 4th June 1478.

Alexander Stewart, son of Albany's first marriage, was in 1516 Abbot of Inchaffray, and afterwards (1527) Bishop of Moray, and died in 1537. The Parliamentary ratification of the divorce in 1516, while asserting John Duke of Albany to be the only lawful son of the late Duke, expressly declares the Abbot of Inchaffray to be illegitimate, and that churchman, present in Parliament, acknowledged his bastardy. As there is no mention of the other children of the divorced lady, it might naturally be presumed that they were dead by that time. Yet there seems to be record evidence (as above) that the daughter was alive as late as 1542.

The only issue of Albany's second marriage appears to have been John, afterwards Duke of Albany, Regent in the minority of James v.

The relations between Richard and the King of Scots continuing on an ostensibly friendly footing, a treaty was concluded at Nottingham on the 21st September, and ratified by James on 21st October 1484, for a three years' truce, and the marriage of the heir of the Scottish Crown to Anne, daughter of John Duke of Suffolk and niece of King Richard. It was agreed that Dunbar Castle, against which the siege operations had hitherto been ineffectual, was to enjoy the benefit of the treaty for six months, after which time James might renew his attempt to recover it.[1]

A prominent accomplice in Albany's conspiracy, James Gifford of Sheriffhall, by whom the English had been admitted into Dunbar Castle, was attainted in the Parliament of May 1485.[2]

[1] Fœdera, xii. pp. 235, 244, 250.

[2] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 173.

On or soon after the expiry of the stipulated three months, the siege of Dunbar Castle was renewed—the March accounts imply that it had been renewed before 6th December 1485;[1] and in June 1486 its custody was committed to John Ramsay, Lord Bothwell.[2]

Queen Margaret is alluded to as the "late Queen" in the Carrick account dated 1st August 1486,[3] and her death is noted as having occurred during the period covered by an account ranging from 11th July 1486 to 3rd July 1487.[4] The exact date seems to have been July 14, 1486.[5] Her death, no doubt, facilitated the schemes by which the disaffected nobles insidiously alienated the affections of the young Duke of Rothesay from his father. The Queen's piety and exemplary life was such that Pope Innocent VIII. in 1487 appointed a commission, consisting of the Primate of Scotland, the Bishop of Glasgow, the Bishop Elect of Aberdeen, and the Abbot of Holyrood, to inquire into her virtues and miracles with a view to her canonisation.[6]

The battle of Bosworth (22nd August 1484) and accession of Henry VII. of England had made no change in the appearance of friendship between the two countries; and in November 1487 a treaty was concluded between the Kings of England and Scotland, for the marriage of the Scottish heir-apparent with one, and the King's second son, the Marquess of Ormond, with another, of the sisters of the Queen of England, and of the royal widower himself with the widow of Edward IV.[1] These projects were frustrated by the rebellion of the following year. But the events of the ten months succeeding the last audit of James III., including the conspiracy which brought this reign to its tragic close at Sauchieburn, come within the scope of the next rather than of the present volume.

IV.

In continuation of some notes on the coinage in the Prefaces to former volumes, a few remarks seem to be called for on the monetary affairs of Scotland during the reigns of James II. and James III., a subject regarding which these records supply us with material information.

There had been a debasement of the coinage in the latter part of the reign of the first James; and in the accounts of the first year of James II., as in those of the close of the preceding reign, we find the great customs still paid in the old money, which was computed to be worth one-fifth more than the new.[2] Much English (as well as Flemish and French) money circulated, and the value of English and foreign pieces became a frequent subject of two later accounts, one embracing the period from March 1473–74 to July 1476,[1] and another, rendered 18th August 1477, and apparently going back to October preceding.[2] All these speak of coinages both of gold and of silver, the seignorage continuing the same as to the gold money and groats, but on small money, "minutis denariis et obolis," of which a large quantity was coined, it was only 1d. in the ounce. During the first nine years of the reign there were coined 21 pounds weight of gold, and nearly 900 of silver. The gold coins in the accounts of 1476 and 1487 are particularised as "scuta," rydaris, and unicornis.[3] The coinage was the subject of considerable legislation, which need not be here particularised, in the Parliament of 1475, when the value of all current gold and silver coins was raised.

But along with the gold and silver currency there coexisted a coinage of black money, whose depreciation was one of the clamant grievances of this reign, and of which mention is made in the account rendered in June 1468 and comprising the coinage of two years. On this rather obscure subject we get some glimpses of light from the Exchequer records. We learn from the account rendered in 1468 by Alexander Tod and William

[3] The two latter are well known and well executed pieces, whose types are respectively the King on horseback and the unicorn; but the "scuta" (unless the "lions" be what is meant) do not seem to be known to numismatists.

Goldsmyth, moneyers, that between June 1466 and June 1467 there had been a very considerable coinage of "nigra moneta," by agreements between the King and Council and the accountants, of which the profits to the King are returned as £650. The same account informs us that these black pieces, which were on their first issue "in part" current for halfpence, were reduced in value by the Lords of Council to farthings, the King making up the deficiency in his allowance to the poor.[1] The pieces alluded to were perhaps coined in accordance with an Act of 9th October 1466,[2] directing a coinage of copper money, though in terms of that Act they should have been issued as farthings—not halfpennies. The moneyer in whose account mention of these pieces occurs is referred to in the Treasurer's accounts of 1488 as "Wille Goldsmyth called Halfpeny man."[3]

But it appears that, besides these halfpennies which had been reduced to farthings, there had been about the same time an issue of black pennies, perhaps forming part of the "nigra moneta" the profits of which were accounted for by Tod and Goldsmyth;

for, in the Parliament which met in October 1467, a commission was appointed to determine "how mony black d̃. salbe tane in payment in the pund."[1] The enactments of the same Parliament regarding the coinage include a prohibition against striking more "blak pennyis:"[2] and, although in such later moneyers' accounts of this reign as are extant there is no mention of black money (a term which apparently included both copper and billon), it would seem that before 1473 a billon coinage of placks and half-placks (or pennies) had been introduced. This is shown by an enactment of 23rd July of that year—"As tuiching the plakkis and the new pennyis the lordis thinks that the striking of thame be cessit, and thai have the cours that thai now have unto the time that the fynance of them be knawne, and quhethir thai halde v s̃. fyne silver of the unce, as was ordanit by the Kingis hienes and promittit be the cunyeouris."[3]

These pieces seem to be the placks and half-placks represented in Mr Cochran-Patrick's "Records of the Coinage of Scotland," vol. ii. plate iv., Nos. 1 and 2; and they appear to be identified by that very high authority with the placks issued by or under advice of Thomas Cochrane, the sudden lowering of whose value was one of the moving causes of the outbreak at Lauder Bridge. If so, the "Cochrane-placks" were of billon, and not (as asserted in the generally trustworthy Chronicle in the Royal MS. of Wyntoun) of copper. In the Exchequer accounts after the date of Lauder Bridge, there are frequent reference to the crying down (declamatio) of the black money or "plakkis." The account of the custumars of Edinburgh rendered in 1483 contains a payment in terms of a precept under the sign manual of date 23rd July of that year (which is given at length) of £180, 16s. "to the workmen that wrocht the blac money of our command."[1] In his account audited October 2, 1482, Lord Kennedy, as Chamberlain of Carrick, compounds for the loss sustained by him in respect of a payment made to him the previous Whitsunday of £51 in black money, "licet non solverit in tempore."[2] In 1484 the custumar of Edinburgh is allowed £440, in consideration of a portion of the customs having been in his hands at the time of the declamation. Similar allowances are made to the custumars of Aberdeen[3] and the receiver of Kinclevin;[4] and Thomas Simson when Comptroller is complained of by the Chamberlain of Moray for having wrongfully refused to receive from him £105 in placks during the time when they were still legally current.[5]

In 1485 placks were still in extensive circulation, both those last coined and counterfeit money struck by false coiners. The Parliament of that year, after ordaining the placks and half-placks should be current at the value at which they were "cryit to of before," enacted severe penalties against persons refusing to receive them, and at the same time called them all in, true and false, directing the moneyers to give 2d. for each plack. That these placks were of billon and not copper appears from the further direction given that they should be "fynit," and a new penny of fine silver coined of them.[1]

V.

At this period of Scottish history the Crown lands formed the largest source of the royal revenues. In the Preface to volume sixth an analysis was attempted of the accounts of these lands as they existed in the reign of James II. During the reign of James III. there had been added to them, Orkney on the King's marriage, Ross on the forfeiture of the Lord of the Isles, and, for a time, Bothwell. Bothwell had been a Douglas possession inherited from the Morays. At the time of the forfeiture of the last Earl of Douglas in 1455 it was in possession of Euphemia Graham, widow of the 5th Earl, and that lady continued to possess it as wife of James Lord Hamilton.[2] On [2] She is styled "domina de Bothwell," vol. vii. pages 440, 621.

Hamilton's second marriage the rents of Bothwell were, at least for the term of Martinmas 1473, in possession of his wife the Princess Mary.[1] From 1473 to 1481 they are accounted for as belonging to the Crown, after which last date they disappear from the Rolls, in consequence of the grant of Bothwell to the King's favourite, John Ramsay.[2]

Kilmarnock and other forfeited Boyd lands, having been granted to the Queen for life, do not appear in the accounts of this reign.

From the time when it was granted to Thomas Boyd as an earldom, Arran ceased to be included in the accounts of Bute. There are afterwards separate accounts of Arran in 1478, 1480, and 1486, the fermes of which, in respect of its still waste condition, are made the subject of a composition with the Comptroller.[3]

Taking the gross rental of the Crown lands from the audit of 1486, and adding one third (for Galloway one fifth) of the grassums contained in the rentals, we obtain an average in money of £7500. Adding £3100 for the money value of the rent in grain, marts, sheep, salmon, etc., reckoned at their market value, and under deduction of the money allowances made for marts and sheep and for grain in Ross,[4] we arrive at a total of £106,000 as an approximation to the gross yearly revenue from the Crown lands.

Next to the Crown lands as a source of revenue came the customs. A few remarks were made on the customs' revenue in the reigns of Robert II. and James II. in the Prefaces to former volumes.[1] During the reign of James III. and subsequently, far the largest portion of the customs' revenue continued to be derived from the duties on wool, woolfells, and hides; and these were levied at the same rates to which they had been raised to defray the ransom-money of David II., namely, 2 marks on each sack (of 24 stones) of wool, 10 of which sacks made a last, 1 mark for the 100 (properly 120) woolfells, and 4 marks for the last containing 20 dacres of hides, the dacre consisting of 10 or 12 hides. These rates naturally became less burdensome with the depreciation of the currency. But some of the results obtained from an analysis of the customs' accounts at successive periods are worthy of notice. The gross customs' returns in the reign of Robert II. were shown[2] to indicate that the wars of the minority of David II. had impaired the material prosperity of Scotland less than might have been imagined, and in particular that Scotland must in or about 1378 have reared more than a million and a half of sheep, or more than half the number reared in 1814. During the reign of Robert III. and the regency of Albany, however, the yield of the same customs had been falling off; and in the reign of James I. (after his return from England), the average yield did not much exceed £5000, to set against £7640 in the reign of Robert II. Taking the average of the reign of James III., the gross revenue from the same customs is rather under £2600.[1]

The customs on schorlings, scaldings, futefells, and lenternware, and on the skins of the otter, polecat, fox, roe, etc., first introduced under James I.,[2] seem to have been rather irregularly paid (except in Inverkeithing), during the earlier half of the reign of James III.;[3] and they did not on the whole bring in more than £37 yearly. The Edinburgh accounts indicate that the duties on schorlings, etc., were leviable from strangers only, and not from burgesses or dwellers within burgh,[4] and that their rate was an ad valorem one of 2s. in the £.[5]

Scottish woollen cloth was still, as in the reign of James I., charged with an ad valorem export duty of 2s. in the £. It was chiefly shipped from the ports of Leith (average custom £50), Kirkcudbright (average £16), and Dundee (average £9); the average for the whole ports of Scotland being about £108 yearly.

[1] Of this sum £1528 is the yield from Edinburgh, £366 from Aberdeen, £170 from Dundee, £162 from Haddington, £67 from Perth, £47 from St Andrews, £44 from Linlithgow, £32 from Cupar, £28 from Kirkcudbright, £23 from Stirling, £19 from Montrose, £17 from Ayr, £15 from Inverness, £14 from Inverkeithing, £11 from Dumbarton, none of the remaining ports coming up to an average of £10.

Next to wool and hides the most important article of export was salmon. A duty of 2s. 6d. per £ was imposed in 1424 on salmon "bocht be strangeris and had out of the realm,"[1] and an Act of 1426 declares the custom to be payable by indwellers in the realm as well as "fremmyt men,"[2] an ordinance confirmed in 1449.[3] In 1478 salmon were ordered under a penalty to be packed only in barrels (of which 12 made a last) of Hamburg measure;[4] and in 1487 it was further ordained that each barrel should be capable of containing 14 gallons; and every burgh was ordered to have three hoop irons for measuring the barrels, and a brand to mark them.[5] Before 1466 it had been the practice in Aberdeen to pay export duty at the rate of 2s. per Hamburg barrel; but in 1466 an Order of Council raised the rate to 3s. as in other places.[6] The custom was about 1480–81 raised by Royal proclamation to 4s. per barrel, and charged accordingly.[7]

The burghers of Aberdeen had, as far back as the reign of James I., enjoyed an exceptional immunity from custom of salmon, which the custumars of that town only levied from strangers. The like privilege was asserted in the reign of James II. and James III.; and in December 1482 and September 1483 was confirmed by Royal charter. This immunity is asserted in the accounts of 1486 to have been revoked by James III.; nevertheless, until the audit of 1488 the burgesses seem to have resisted payment.[1] Notwithstanding this exemption, the return of custom of salmon at Aberdeen was, during the second half of the reign of James III., higher than that of any other port, about £135 annually. The yield of Banff was £47, of Berwick £44, of Perth £29, of Elgin and Forres £15, of Dundee £14, of Montrose £7, of Stirling £6, and of the whole of Scotland about £310.

In the first Parliament of James I. an export duty on herrings was imposed at 1d. on each 1000 fresh fish sold, 4s. on each last (12 barrels) barrelled by Scotsmen, 6s. if barrelled by strangers, and 4d. on every thousand red herrings.[2] In the North Berwick account of 1482 the duty charged is 1s. per barrel, said to be in terms of a Royal proclamation, and the custumars are stated through ignorance to have charged only 6d. on the barrel.[3] The herring trade in some of the arms of the sea on the west coast had become important during the period of this volume. The custom of herrings of Lochfyne is returned by the custumars of Irvine at £10 in 1479, £17 in 1480, and £34 in 1481.[4] From the Ballivi ad Extra and the custumars and bailies of the burghs, supplemented by the accounts of the Sheriffs, ought to enable us to form something like an approximate estimate of the revenue of the Scottish Crown during the reign of James III. In 1471, the only year of this reign of which the Sheriffs' accounts have been preserved, their charge side (excluding arrears) amounts to £1720. We have therefore a sum equivalent to about £5460 sterling money.

It remains for the Editor to express his warmest thanks to Mr Thomas Dickson, LL.D., the head of the Historical Department of the Register House, for valuable counsel in many a difficulty encountered in this and preceding volumes. To Mr George Melville also his best acknowledgments are due for important help in transcription and collation.
